Nov 11, 2019Envision Steam Envision was an early computer game network developed by Kien Giang Ngoc at the University of San Francisco for their introduction to CS curriculum. The source code is still available, and can be downloaded in its entirety and run from any Windows or Linux machine. History Envision began as an experiment to enable visual programming of interactive worlds, initially for interactive fiction. It provided a very early version of TorqueScript, and later a simplified version, in June 1984, from a translation of an earlier version of John Reynolds' LispWorks C compiler (LW C). Computing environments were beginning to be standardized in 1984, when Apple's HyperCard was introduced. By late 1985, Envision had become a HyperCard-based visual programming environment, with a simplified version based on the HyperTalk environment with graphic renditions of Lisp macros. Envision was used in a number of computer science projects. In January 1986, USF's Computer Science Department announced the Envision programming language, based on the Objective Caml programming language. Envision was used to teach basic computing concepts to non-programmers, enabling them to make games, simulations, and other interactive simulations.
